

PRINCESS ELARA AND THE SECRET GARDEN OF STARS

A Little Story About Kindness, Courage, and Wonder

In a little kingdom of green hills and honeybees, there lived a princess named Elara.
She loved the night sky more than anything in the world.

But one autumn,
the stars began to go out.
Each night, a few more quietly disappeared.

Then something small and warm tumbled into the roses.
It was a star with one bent point, glowing very faintly.

The old gardener knew the story.
Far past the thorn hedge and the singing river, there is a garden where stars are grown.

It is a long way for small feet.

Then I should start now.

The thorn hedge was dark and scratchy, and Elara was afraid.
So she went slowly,
and she went anyway.

At the river, a moth lay shivering on a stone with a torn wing. Elara stopped to help, even though stopping cost her time.

She mended the wing with one silver thread from her scarf. The moth flew a happy loop and lit the path ahead like a tiny lantern.

At the top of the hill stood a golden gate with no handle and no key.
Three words were carved upon it:
Kindness opens me.

Elara did not know how to open it.
Then the little moth landed on the gate,
and it swung wide all on its own.

Inside grew the secret garden of stars, hanging like lanterns on silver vines. But the garden was dry, and tangled with weeds.

All night Elara pulled the weeds and carried water from the singing river. Then she tucked the little bent star into the warm dark soil.

By morning, the star
had grown roots of light.
And that night, the whole sky was shining again.

No one in the kingdom ever knew who saved the stars. But Elara knew, and so did one small moth.

‘And remember, little one:
Even the smallest act of kindness can brighten someone’s whole world.’
